

Theme four – What is our role in creating history?

While a look through our country's history will reveal the richness in culture and diversity it offers, it can also show us those darker, divisive chapters of our past too.

Yet if we're open to the fact that we are an active part of history, we would come to find how our lives and our perceptions of the past actively contribute to how we see the present and form the future.

This theme encourages us to engage with these exhibits with a discerning mind and a critical eye – to see the society we live in and the history behind it, not through the filter of our background, our identity, or sometimes even what we may already know, but with an open and critical mind that realises our own role in creating history is through a conscious understanding of our ability to shape the discourse around us whether in the digital space or physical one.
